SUGGESTED ANSWER

My mother talked and talked/kept talking/went on and on talking - I hadn't even suspected that she knew so many words. I let her take everything out of her, pour out every last drop, although I could see that she was inventing things that could not possibly be true, because at the time when they (had) happened I was no longer a child n/or crazy, and I could remember/remembered. I mean, I remembered that they simply hadn't existed, that they hadn't happened, and that no matter how beautifully she would have told them now, on her deathbed, they were nothing but lies.

It would have been nice for them to have existed. To have had and to have felt at least half of what my mother was rambling about on that Saturday in that summer, but memories, like all good things, have a price. And we - she and dad, and I - was always been stingy and we always preferred to stuff ourselves rather than invest in a memory.
